

An aerial photograph of a vast mountainous landscape. In the foreground, a wide, braided river with multiple channels winds through a lush green valley. The river's channels are light-colored, possibly due to sand or gravel. The surrounding slopes are covered in dense green vegetation. In the middle ground, a large, dark, rugged mountain peak rises prominently, its slopes appearing steep and rocky. Beyond this peak, more mountain ranges are visible, receding into the distance under a sky filled with white, fluffy clouds. The overall scene depicts a wild, mountainous region.

Wild heart of the Yukon Territory, the Peel watershed is rich in rugged peaks and braided rivers. It also harbors vast mineral wealth, sparking fierce debate over its future.
