Forensic Techniques

- The police was lead to all of Dahmer's crimes by a man, Tracy Edwards, who Dahmer attacked and threatened earlier that day. The man escaped, and lead the police to the crime scene.
- The police discovered a severed head, and other body parts in Dahmer's fridge. From there, they collected the blood splatters that was on the floor of the fridge for DNA tests.
- The police also found multiple, dismembered body parts belonging to his victims. Investigators used DNA samples to identify which body parts belonged to which, and who they were.
- The FBI also needed to fill some holes on who the victims were, and where they come from, so they traced Dahmer's trail around the United States, and even around the world.

Modus Operandi

- Dahmer would go to gay bars to find victims, who were usually African American men that were traveling or close to becoming criminals, and convince them to come back to his apartment by bribing them with money.
- When he'd bring them back to his apartment, he would drug his victims by lacing their drinks with drugs, and then strangle them to death.
- He would then do whatever he wanted with the unconscious bodies and then dismember them. Sometimes he would experiment with his victims by drilling into their skulls while they were still alive, and inject them with muriatic acid to "preserve" them and see how long they'd survive.
- He would keep some of the body parts as trophies, take pictures of the bodies during the murdering process, and he would eat the flesh as well. He kept the leftover body parts in his freezer, fridge, and gallon-drums.
